Beyond the Perf

Stamp creators reveal how they solved key design challenges.

How do you bring history to life for a modern audience?

Artist Nancy Stahl used a surprising model for the artwork on the new women's suffrage stamp: herself. Determined to capture the dramatic lighting she wanted for her illustrations, Stahl put on a white shirt, wrapped a white tablecloth around her waist, donned a sun hat, and stood on top of her coffee table to pose for the camera.

"I always pose myself when I can't find exactly what I want," says Stahl, who once fashioned a cap from a coffee filter so that she could recreate a nurse's outfit. "Then I mesh the photographs together [with the original source material] in my mind."

For the 19th Amendment: Women Vote stamp, that meant combining her "self-portraits" with several historic photographs that featured suffragists marching proudly with banners. The resulting illustration feels accessible to today's viewers while still honoring the history of the amendment.

"We wanted to make this our contemporary celebration of what these women did 100 years ago," stamp art director Ethel Kessler explains.

Higher-contrast lighting and clean, crisp lines make the women on the stamp feel distinctly modern, as do the deep, intense colors. Purple, white, and gold are the official hues of the historic National Woman's Party, and in Kessler's view, they've "traveled 100 years very nicely."

Stahl laughs when she remembers the self-portrait photographs she took for the stamps — to get the lighting right on her face, she folded the front brim of the sun hat back "like a pirate hat," she says — but both Stahl and Kessler also felt the gravity of the assignment. The final stamp is a stirring work of art that honors the incredible bravery and perseverance of women's suffrage activists.

"What if those women hadn't stepped out? Where would we be now?" asks Kessler. "We took it quite seriously. This stamp makes you feel as if we could all get dressed in white today and start marching. We could be those women."
